The main purpose of virtual machines is to allow users to run different software in one place and not have to worry about damaging or losing any programs and data. Many people are able to save money by using a virtual machine that is free to use and share.

Lightroom CS5.1 should be an easy choice for any photographer who wants to shop, view, and work on his or her photos at all times on the go. The new Edges tool is available in the same camera as of Lightroom 3.0. If you would like to see the dialog box in Action, choose Edit Adjustments Edit Edges. This tool allows you to get rid of unwanted edge enhancements in the Photoshop image editor. Another handy addition to the menus is the ability to choose the type of the lens in the Lens Select dialogue box. I personally think this is a big win, seeing as it will make the work of professionals easier because they can simply choose a lens that's most suited for the subject. Most of the new features in this CS5.1 version can be found in Lightroom 3.2. In fact, the functionality of the software has grown so much since the last release that it was renamed Lightroom 3.2. Some of the features in this version are the ability to auto-correct perspective issue, as well as the popular eye-sensor auto-exposure feature. The key-focus-monitor functionality is also a new addition. It allows you to add focus points and add controls to them. This is very useful for those who have a DSLR with a dial system or a camera that has a focus mode switch. Yet another new feature that's very convenient and many photographers will surely enjoy on the go is the ability to choose a More label for your folders. I'll be honest, I wasn't a big fan of the first generation of the iPad when I reviewed my first one just over a year ago. I'm hoping, though, that with the second-gen iPad Pro in my hands, the good outweighs the not-so-good.
