NewClone is a small, easy to use application designed to set the host's ip-adress, run newsid, change the computername and join a domain. This application starts a "differnt" script when the host has booted up and then waits for a prompt of the new IP, new computer name and domain name. NewClone starts itself on each restart of the host. NewClone includes a script called newsid which provides information for newsid to set the host's IP-adress, computername and join the host to the network. NewClone is an easy to use application designed to automatically set the IP-adress, run newsid, change the computername and join a domain. Only two things are asked at the beginning (ip and computernaem), then the program runs through the whole make-change - restart - join - restart -... process. The IP address can also be changed from the config file if you want to keep it. The config file is a simple text file (txt) with an IP-adress, computername and domain, no port is needed. Warning: NewClone has one more problem. In version 2.0 and above the program does not work with Windows XP. Usage: The program must be started from the commandline. The program has no gui interface, so all settings are done with the commandline. First thing you have to do is to enter the computer name, the domain and the IP-adress.
