Navy Secretary Robert Neller is still at the helm of the Navy, even though Donald Trump has removed Defense Secretary James Mattis, and has promised the nation in an interview that he will replace Mattis with someone who will be tougher on Iran, the United States' traditional rival. This is, essentially, a campaign promise that Mattis did not make, and now Trump is missing a chance to fulfill it. Mattis is not the only defense secretary who has had to fight for his job: former Secretary of Defense Bob Gates was fired by President Obama; former Secretary of Defense Ash Carter was not replaced when he resigned; former Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta resigned in the middle of his second term. The Trump administration is reportedly already talking to leading retired four-star generals about taking over the post. The president's choice to replace Mattis will be a difficult one, but one in which the president already seems to have his mind made up. But the defense secretary position is of such importance that it can't be left vacant. A president who can't stand the defense secretary is not likely to be able to stand the defense secretary either. At the same time, a president who values loyalty to friends and family over loyalty to the country is also likely to be unable to work well with the defense
