Binaries containing key information related to the CPU to allow for diagnosis of a problem..Predictors of hospital readmission in spinal cord injury patients. To examine the independent contributions of injury and medical comorbidity level, length of stay, and injury management factors to hospital readmission in acute spinal cord injury (SCI) care. Prospective observational cohort study. Patients with acute SCI were recruited at the acute, subacute, and chronic SCI units at a single tertiary care center. Cohort (n = 410). Secondary outcomes included discharge disposition and self-reported physical and psychosocial function. Logistic regression models were used to examine the association between readmission and key baseline variables adjusted for confounders. With the exception of psychosocial function, characteristics significantly associated with readmission included discharge disposition, age, and length of stay. Variables related to injury management were associated with readmission, but patients discharged to community-based rehabilitation centers were not more likely to be readmitted. With the exception of discharge disposition, patients who were readmitted had lower psychosocial scores, were more likely to be paralyzed below the injury level, and had a higher number of comorbidities. The acute SCI unit should work with primary care providers and rehabilitation specialists to provide optimal management in the home care period, as well as early discharge planning, and post-discharge monitoring to reduce readmission to hospital.
