I love these new Hue integration features, but I was let down that there's no web browser. While I understand that the Hue system isn't meant to be used on its own, this is a real pain when I want to access images or movies through a web browser or smartphone. You can take a photo directly into Lightroom from an iOS app, but you can also edit photos once you've finished taking them using the new Adobe Photoshop plugin. This provides much finer granularity control than even the most powerful smartphone apps give you. When I've had a bad experience with software in the past, particularly Adobe's recent image-editing history, I've tended to give Adobe a pass on the next release. But when I found out that the new Photoshop also supports the iPad Pro and its Apple Pencil, I knew I had to give it a go. This new version of Photoshop seems to be very difficult on my macbook air. It gets hot very quickly. Even after playing a quick game of Diablo 3 and then working "50%" on the document opened in photoshop it was at 90-100 C and my screen was very hot to the touch. The fan is loud at max speed and I suspect something may be clogging up somewhere, but I haven't found any potential culprits yet. Impressive that you can crop to highlight a section of an image without losing any work. However if this feature is non-locking, and users go to view in projections, this could be very dangerous. There has been a trend of photoshop being used as a replacement for Lightroom - I think due to the fact that the two are on the same track when it comes to getting intuitive for a new user. It is a shame that the learning curve has become so steep.
