In the explore panel, when you click on a thumbnail, there is an option to "Select All" and "Invert Selection". When you select either of these options, all the thumbnails change to grey, which makes it easier to spot the currently selected thumbnail. This is a nice option to have, and a feature that I wasn't aware of. The update to the Options bar and Explore panel are well done. I want to see each PS document represented by icons that I am familiar with. The current arrangement of the thumbnails in the Explore panel lacks any form of organization. PS should make this general layout the first thing that happens when you open a document. At the very least, they should display the document name and version number at the top of the panel. I like the current thumbnail arrangement with the icon, with text information, and then the standard Photoshop tools on the bottom. It really comes down to what features you use. It's no secret that many schools use the editing power of Photoshop to create web pages (and therefore mobile device pages) with web fonts. I just completed a project for my school and had no issues after making the switch to Photoshop CS6. However, the image quality of the print is still a bit lacking. Would you seriously say that the quality of my photo from the iPad is on par with the quality of a print? That's hard to believe. The only difference is that I was working in 60 dpi versus 72 dpi. This requires a pretty powerful computer to edit on. Even then, I often end up shooting at 1280x720 to get a good 32 images.
