The radio system is more particularly related to land mobile radio systems in which the information is transmitted in the form of digitally encoded bursts from a transmitter to a receiver equipped with a single antenna. During the transmission of information, the transmission medium between the transmitter and receiver may be disturbed in various ways. For example, it may be interrupted during the transmission. Alternatively, it may change its characteristics during the transmission so that bursts of information which it has previously transmitted are no longer received. To deal with the latter condition, it is known to employ, for example, a so-called "burst mode" operation. In this mode, the transmitter continuously transmits information on an unmodulated carrier, using predetermined "burst" widths and with the interval between successive bursts being constant. In other words, the transmitter transmits signals which have a constant width on the burst transmission timeslots. The receiver includes a burst mode control circuit for monitoring the radio channel for the presence of digital bursts and for transmitting on a further information channel a request for transmission of a new burst, or for informing the transmitter of the presence of a digital burst. In this respect, the transmitter may include a burst mode
