Vaccination is a critical step in the development of protection against infectious diseases. The choice of the appropriate delivery system is of utmost importance for the development of a successful immunisation. Nucleic acid-based vaccines are introduced in the market in spite of the fact that they cannot be used for humans. The major reason for the failure is the route of administration which should ensure an adequate delivery of the vaccine to the targeted site. There are only few reports that demonstrated that these nucleic acid-based vaccines can be used for effective immunisation in humans. The major challenge for the development of protein-based vaccines is the antigen delivery system. Both the nature and the dose of the antigens are crucial determinants of the humoral and cellular immune responses. In the current development of protein-based vaccines, issues pertaining to the design of appropriate carriers that can efficiently target the antigen delivery to the desired host are highlighted. Protein-based carriers are more attractive for the vaccine delivery. They will reduce the complexity of the antigen delivery system. Furthermore, protein-based carriers can incorporate the antigen and facilitate its presentation at the appropriate site of the immune system. This paper provides the path of protein-based vaccines development. The specific requirements of the protective humoral and cellular immunity against the microbial pathogens are described in this review. The different approaches of the protein-based delivery systems that can address these requirements are highlighted. The advantages of these delivery systems as well as the existing challenges in developing protein-based vaccines are described in this article.This is an archived article and the information in the article may be outdated.
