Psihologia dezvoltarii umane ana muntean pdf.Q: Android: How to share data between applications? If I create an application such as AirplaneSim that runs in the background of my main Android application, is there a way to share a key/secret with AirplaneSim to access the Google Play Market? Is there a reliable way? Is there an API, or some sort of communication framework that is designed to do this? Thanks. A: Apps cannot access each other's data except for what is granted through whatever sharing mechanisms they have. Sharing across processes is even further limited. In order to allow one app to access another's data, you need to either share the data through a content provider (this basically allows you to manipulate data for one app from another), or share the data through an account. A: Take a look here. It appears that this is the only way right now... Unfortunately it's one of the few methods for sharing data (compared to other methods such as SQLite or using messaging). For example: The AIRPLANE SIM application can save its data to a file in the phone so that it can be accessed by another application. When it needs to share a key or secret, it can use Android's built in method to share data between applications using an application, not a file. Al. 02-1223, Doc. 30 at 13-15; see also Doc.
