Speaking of cloning, Lightroom 5's cloning is so much better than the Lightroom 4 "clone stamp," especially when you use the default fill setting. It just looks a lot better, as well. Use the fill settings to change what happens when you clone small changes into a large area of the image. Hardware acceleration is better in Lightroom 5 than it was in Lightroom 4. The clone stamp tool and various other image editing tools are fully hardware accelerated. Lightroom 5 has the capacity to add filenames to your image numbers based on information you provide. It makes a great idea for a catalog, but it isn't as smooth as the option I have in Lightroom 4.3. I have a folder with about 200 big image files. If I add a filename to each image, Lightroom 5 will create a new file for each photo, even the ones with the same name. I don't have to tell the program how many photos are in a single file; it just does what it does. In previous versions, I had to tell the program that the file contains more than one image. It's a good idea to keep the name of the folder that your image files reside in in the Filename section. This makes it easier for Lightroom CC to establish the relationship between images. Although I'm happy with the Lightroom 5 I've been using, there still I won't be switching to the new version. Lightroom 4.2 didn't handle my catalog well enough. If I take a photo and then decide to edit whatever was in that catalog, Lightroom asks me to make corrections to the original file.

Not all file formats are supported though, which means some images may need to be re-exported as a new format. See the support matrix here. Data retention will vary based on when you save the file; some images may not retain the originals, while all original changes and selections will be retained. Photoshop on the web does things on the GPU's, but with macOS, there is no longer a GPU (graphics processing unit). All operations are now performed on the CPU. Photographers need to be aware that editing may take longer since the system handles the biggest portion of the processing. Smaller converters built for Elements can continue to run in the background while you're editing so that the GPU is freed up for processing. Some features, such as some transitions, may not operate properly in this setting. For the best overall experience, we recommend that you work with a macOS native app with Scene Cache, such as DaVinci Resolve, and a Mac computer. The famous Layer Styles feature in Photoshop that allows you to make color-based adjustments to individual layers (called layer masks) won't automatically update if your image is edited. Instead, you'll need to reload your image. You also won't see any of the creative customizations available in the Adobe Style workspace — adjustments such as crossfades or tint of adjustment layers will no longer appear in the image.
